1 this is a good start. remember to keep in mind that your introduction sets the tone for the rest of the paper: a good intro and thesis, when carried through properly, can really make a paper.
2 i like this thought; you have to be careful, however, about making assertions that are don backed up directly in the body of your paper.

topic question #1: Could the thesis of this paper be improved? How? (no minimum length) while the thesis isn't objectionable, it also isn't particularly interesting. if you were to add a little spice to the sentence, like you do later (see mark 2) it might grab the reader a little more.
